COOKERY IN CUBA.

Some of the Dishes Which Are Famous In the Island.

So much has been said about the starvation of the reconcentrados and the hunger of the Cuban army that the mame of Cuba is not agit to awaken in the American mind epicurean visions of dainy dishes. It should be otherwise. What is resily incompsehensible to people who have lived in Cuba, notwithstanding the only too stern reality is that death from starvation should be possible in a country so richly estaway agant on their table. The inner man is catered to in preference to the outer. It seems almost as if the tropical sun created a craving for food with which to balance the losses occasioned by the extreme heat. Meaks are served as they are in Europe, on the continent—that's, coffee or chocolate and rolls in the morning, a substantial breakfast at noon, and dinner in the evening. As the afterneous are long and hot, some cooling drink is generally taken at alout 3 o'clock.

The chief defect of the Cuban distribution of incooking with of the sances, but this fault, like most others is an inheritance from Spain, which colonized the sidend and lid the foundation of its cookery, just as England did of the American and rolls in the fault and the foundation of its cookery, just as England did of the American pain repulsive ta American pain red proposed with modoration.

The markets of Havana are well supplied; the eggs and the poultry, which is cort-fed are excellent, the fish from the Gulf of Mexico are renowned for their dayor, and, not being kept on ise, are superior to those to be had in New Tork.
